EROTICS AND FRIENDSHIP IN EMPEROR JULIAN’S FOURTH ORATION

Mark Masterson
Classics Programme, Victoria University of Wellington
Wellington 6012, New Zealand

Abstract. This paper explores the emperor Julian’s use of pederastic and same-sex sexual tropes to characterize the importance of his friendship with Saturninius Secundus Salutius. The “Self-Consolation” or Oration 4 is read in light of its intertextualities with Theocritus, Plato, and various ancient discussions of dreams with nocturnal emissions.

Ïη τούτον μὲν ἀτε δὴ μειξόνας καὶ περὶ μειξόνων οὐ κινητέον, ὡσπερ ἐν θεάτῳ μικρῷ μηχανάς μεγάλας . . .

(Julian. Or. 4.3.244A)

1 This article is based on presentations given at the 2004 Classical Association of the Atlantic States meeting in Philadelphia, the 2005 meeting of the American Philological Association in Boston, and the 2008 meeting of the Australasian Society for Classical Studies in Christchurch, New Zealand. I thank the Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences at Victoria University of Wellington (New Zealand) for its support. My friends Kirk Ormand, Arthur Pomeroy, and Steven Smith graciously shared their expertise with me and Jen Oliver was unfailingly reliable in securing tomes that she teasingly pretended seemed odd. I am grateful to William Dominik for all his considerable help. As always, this is for TRH and I give a pat to N.

Or are these [words to be acted-out], inasmuch as they are greater and are about greater things, not to be set in motion, as though they were great stage machinery in a small theater . . . ?

The fourth oration of emperor Julian, the “Self-Consolation on the Departure of the Most-Excellent Salutius,” so far as I know, has not been subjected in recent times to sustained critique. Julian wrote this substantial oration\(^3\) in 358/359 CE while he, as Caesar, was campaigning on the northern frontier. While the details are murky, it appears that Salutius,\(^4\) who had been the holding the quaestura sacri palatii in Julian’s court,\(^5\) was summoned across the Alps so that Julian’s cousin, emperor Constantius II, could install Lucillianus (who would keep a closer eye on the goings on). In the “Letter to the Athenians” (10.282C), Julian portrays the summoning of Salutius as a hostile move calculated to isolate him. This oration often has been seen, quite logically, as a testament to Julian’s anguish over the departure of his friend and advisor, with whom he shared philosophical interests.\(^6\) I agree that the oration is revelatory of anguish,

---

\(^3\) At about 3000 words, Julian’s Oration is roughly the length of Cicero’s Pro Archia and a few hundred words longer than Lysias’ On the Death of Eratosthenes.

\(^4\) Salutius’ full name is Saturninius Secundus Salutius and his name appears as Σαλουστιος in the oration and other Greek sources.

\(^5\) A. Gutsfeld, “Secundus,” Brill’s New Pauly (http://www.brillonline.nl/subscriber/uid=1773/entry?entry=bnp_e110628); J. Harries, “The Roman Imperial Quaestor from Constantine to Theodosius II,” JRS 78 (1988) 156-58 discusses the development of the office of quaestor in the fourth century and describes Salutius himself in his role as quaestor.

\(^6\) Controversy may attend this claim about shared philosophical interests. There is a minor late-Platonic treatise (De Deis et Mundo) that is clearly related to Julian’s eighth oration (both the treatise and oration feature similarly completed discussions of Attis, as well as marked similarities of thought). “Saloustios” is the author of this treatise. Debate has centered on whether the author is the same as the addressee of the consolation (Saturninius Secundus Salutius) or a certain Flavius Sallustius (who was consul with Julian in 363)—for the Greek name will allow either identification. What makes this debate relevant to the present discussion of Julian’s fourth oration is that if Saturninius Secundus Salutius is the author, then the treatise is further evidence (over and beyond that on display in the oration) of intellectual interests shared by him and Julian. I incline to identification of the author of this treatise as Saturninius Secundus Salutius (and I have support in this from, e.g., E. Clarke, “Communication, Human and Divine: Saloustios Reconsidered,” Phronesis 43 (1998)
but I also see it as revelatory of a connection between the politically significant relationship of Salutius and Julian and same-sex sexual desire. In arguments to come, I will explore the same-sex sexual imagery that characterizes Julian’s words about his friendship with Salutius and the uses this imagery serves. We will discover in particular that Julian uses this imagery to mark out his friendship with Salutius as an important relation that deserves respect; the imagery ultimately serves a political purpose. First, however, I offer a survey of prior scholarship in the interests of contextualizing the investigation that will follow.

As said above, Oration 4 has been read as indicative of Julian’s distress at his enforced separation from his friend. Bowersock perceives in the oration “an elaborate and intense discourse of regret on [Salutius’] departure”⁷ and Athanassiadi-Fowden, attuned to the marked intertextuality of the speech with Homer, sees anguish over separation from his friend contrasted with a vision of the lost Eden of his boyhood studies;⁸ the trauma of the present separation parallels that caused by his having to leave his boyhood teacher, Mardonius (2.241C). Also sensitive to the intertextuality with Homer in the oration, Rosen underscores its topical conventionality.⁹ And he is correct: handbooks provide patterns which Julian uses.¹⁰ Scholarship about this speech has also considered what it tells the reader about Julian’s notion of friendship, for he and Salutius have a friendship (φιλία: 2.242C) and they are friends (φίλοι: 2.242A, 3.242D, 3.243C).¹¹ Bringmann notes that Julian presents in this oration “ein Denkmal seiner Freundschaft” with Salutius.¹² We can connect Bringmann’s comment to some scholarship from the 1990s. Smith draws attention to the oration’s substantial engagement with Aristotle’s exposition of friendship such as we find it in the Eudemian and Nicomachean Ethics and Guido, writing at greater length in an important article on Julian’s understanding of philia across all of his works, also notes Julian’s frequent resort to Aristotle in the oration. I stress here that Julian’s oration is highly learned and its readership, as recipients of the paideia, would have been learned too. Given that this is the case, reading the oration via Aristotle now reproduces a plausible late-ancient reception, and is the beginning of my argument.

---

¹⁰ See, e.g., Menander Rhetor 2.395.1-399.10 (on the logos propeemptikos) and discussion by F. Cairns, Generic Composition in Greek and Roman Poetry (Edinburgh 1972) 7-16, esp. 7-10.

¹¹ Julian also refers to Salutius as his philos in Oration 5 (10/282C) and Oration 11 (44/157B).

Without denying the emotional component to the oration (as is mentioned by Athanassiadi and Bowersock), I am in part interested in continuing with approaches to the speech that see it as revelatory of the friendship that existed between Julian and Salutius. To this end, I further flesh out the commonalities between this friendship and Aristotle’s ideas on what a friendship should be. What emerges is that Julian leavens considerable similarities to Aristotle’s conceptions with notable differences. Julian speaks of παρθησία ("frankness") and employs the verb derived from this noun (both at 3.243C) and elsewhere emphasizes the pure and uncalculated nature of the dealings that he and Salutius had with one another (e.g., 2.241D, 6.248D). These characterizations of his 15 Noting that Aristotle is named twenty-three times in Julian’s works, J. Bouffartigue, L’Empereur Julien et la Culture de son Temps (Paris 1992) 65, 200-02 sees at least second-hand reference to the Nicomachean Ethics in the Hymn to Helios, the Letter to Themistius, and the oration To the Uneducated Cynics. Bouffartigue sees no mention of the Eudemian Ethics in Julian’s works. Building upon Guido’s and Smith’s remarks, my analysis sees evidence of both these works of Aristotle in Oration 4.

---

friendship with Salutius mark it as post-Aristotelian, for, as Konstan has shown, an emphasis on frankness is a feature of friendships in societies with extreme status discrepancies (e.g., the Hellenistic monarchies and the Roman republic and empire) and hence is a departure from the polis-based model about which Aristotle speaks. The appearance of frankness is not the sole difference from Aristotelian ideals of friendship: it is at this point that I take analysis of the oration in a direction that, so far as I am aware, has not been taken before.

In the course of his remarks, Julian makes reference to Plato’s Charmides (especially 156D-157B) and Theocritus’ Idyll 12 (lines 10-16). This intertextuality, I argue, complements the friendship between these two grown men in pederastic terms and so marks a radical break between Julian’s presentation of his and Salutius’ friendship and Aristotle’s conception of what a friendship should be. In the Eudemian Ethics (Eth. Eud.), for example, Aristotle notes that relations between lover and beloved are different from those between friends. There is a lack of common interests and the lover is often solely interested in things carnal:

---

18 A word about intertextuality may be welcome here. When I speak of intertextuality, I am thinking of the way in which meaning is made by readers/listeners at the time when they are reading or hearing a text. Perceptible links with prior literature—perceptible because of the high level of education among late-ancient elites—enable perceptions of meaning on the basis of a text’s similarity to and difference from older texts (such as those by Theocritus and Plato). Readerly awareness of perceptible relations between texts allows for meanings to emerge. A frequent point of confusion as regards intertextuality is the fact that while the author writes his texts and indeed arguably sets out (and even has the intention) to quote Plato or Theocritus, any meaning that emerges is entirely dependent on the competence of the reader. In the absence of readerly competence the author’s intention counts for nothing (even as we have to say that he is the one who has made reference to Plato, for example). It is also quite conceivable that readers make meanings on the basis of perceived relations with other texts that might surprise an author and even run counter to his intentions (could we know them, and we cannot). Recent stimulating treatments of intertextuality in late antiquity include G. Kelly, Ammianus Marcellinus: The Allusive Historian (Cambridge 2008) and M. Mastrangelo, The Roman Self in Late Antiquity: Prudentius and the Poetics of the Soul (Baltimore 2008). For treatments of intertextuality in the earlier empire, I have found the following most helpful: G. Conte, The Rhetoric of Imitation: Genre and Poetic Memory in Virgil and Other Latin Poets (Ithaca 1986); L. Edmunds, Intertextuality and the Reading of Roman Poetry (Baltimore 2001); D. Fowler, Roman Constructions: Readings in Postmodern Latin (Oxford 2000) 115-137; and S. Hinds, Allusion and Intertext: Dynamics of Appropriation in Roman Poetry (Cambridge 1998).
. . . ὁ ἐρως δοκεῖ φιλία ὁμοιὸν εἶναι: τοῦ γὰρ συζήν ὁρέγεται ὁ ἐρῶν, ἀλλ᾽ οὐχ ἢ μᾶλλον δεῖ, ἀλλὰ κατ᾽ ἀίσθησιν.

(Arist. Eth. Eud. 7.12.1245A 24-26) 19

. . . love seems to be similar to friendship, for the lover of someone wants to be together [with his beloved]; not, however, in the way he especially should [if friendship is at issue], but instead in a sensual way.

Hence, in creating a web of intertextuality that includes the references to Plato and Theocritus, Julian not only transforms the substantial Aristotelianism of the friendship he depicts, he also raises the topic of sexual desire between adult males. As will be shown, it should not occasion surprise that Julian would trope his friendship in same-sex sexual terms; we can find similar instances in late antiquity. What is remarkable, as I will argue, is the degree to which Julian, even as he uses same-sex sexual desire as a metaphor for his friendship with Salutius, seems to suggest that it is more than mere metaphor. He seemingly lets the mask slip, if you will, twice. The reader can draw the conclusion that Julian is “really” feeling desire. For the reader of today, the seeming glimpse of something beyond the play of representation is intriguing and a temptation. But care is called for. In the first place, we have no knowledge about what really happened between Julian and Salutius. Furthermore, any seeming glimpse beyond the play of representation in this most rhetorical of documents must be understood as a further instance of rhetoric; Julian’s gestures toward reality are the devices of a rhetorical showman. And Julian ups the rhetorical stakes for, as I will argue, he audaciously figures his devotion to Salutius as something that could cause dreams accompanied by nocturnal emissions. This excessive figuration and the assertion of a devotion that ceases to use same-sex attraction as a metaphor and instead insists on its reality impress me as typical Julianic hyperbole. But it is hyperbole that sends a message to the readers and listeners of this oration about the power and durability of the connection between Julian and his friend: those who may wish to tamper with Salutius will have Julian to answer to for as long as Julian remains powerful. My analysis also attests to the intelligibility of male/male sexual desire in late antiquity and its perceptible connection to friendship. Here, then, is something rare because sexual desire between adult males is infrequently represented in accounts we have of same-sex desire in both the primary and secondary sources of late antiquity.

Summary of the Fourth Oration

The oration begins with an address to Salutius in which Julian wonders how he will find the words to soothe the grief he feels. Perhaps music or a drug of some kind will be of help (1.240A-C)? As the oration continues, Julian philosophizes, considering whether or not adversity can be productive of pleasure (1.240C-241C). Reflections on the nature of his friendship with Salutius (2.241C-242D; to be discussed below) crescendo into a suicide threat (3.243D). At 3.244A (also to be discussed below), Julian makes reference to the Platonic account of the spells (ἐποδεῖ) of Zamolxis which were to treat the handsome Charmides’ headache. Subsequent to the evocation of this famous scene of homoerotic desire, Julian changes tack and decides to speak ἐκ τῶν ἐμπροσθεν ἔργων . . . τὰ κλέα (“glories from the deeds of old,” 3.244B). In his discussion of Scipio Aemilianus and Laelius (4.244C-245C), he points up the equality of affection they had for one another through a reference to Theocritus’ pederastic Idyll 12. After mentioning other pairs of friends in history, Julian comes to Pericles and Anaxagoras. At this point, he gives a long speech to Pericles (5.246A-248B). In this ἀστεία, Pericles reflects on and regrets the necessity of his separation from his friend. As far as Pericles is concerned, however, as long as they are able to think of one another, he and Anaxagoras will be able to ameliorate the pain of their separation.

Toward the end of this section of the oration Julian (anachronistically) embeds in Pericles’ speech a replay (5.247C-248B) of Plato’s “ladder of love” (Smp. 210A-211C), which climaxes in Pericles’ assertion that his and Anaxagoras’ devotion to things incorporeal (which takes its start from things corporeal) will ensure that they are not assailed by φαντάσματα (“visions”) in the night that have their basis in the body (which I understand, reading with attention to the broad context of late antiquity, to signify nocturnal emissions). When Pericles’ speech ends, Julian straightaway asserts that he cannot manage such sublimity and that he is concerned about the φαντάσματα that are assaulting him as he tries to fashion a consolation to ameliorate his grief (6.248C-D). Continuing the back and forth motion in the oration, a look to the future and hope for divine aid (6.249A-250A) give way again to skepticism about an ability to equal heroes of old but Julian will nonetheless try and hopes that God will aid him (6.250A-D). After a brief discussion of the excesses of Alexander the Great, Julian notes his more limited and sensible needs, saying that, ὡς ἡμῖν καὶ φιλεῖν ὁμολογῶν μόνον, ἐς ἐς τὰ ἀλλὰ σιωπηλότερος ὄν καὶ τῶν Πυθαγόρα γέμησθέντων (“It is enough for me that [my friend] admit only that he loves me too and that he be more silent about other matters than the initiates of Pythagoras,” 7.251C-D). The oration ends with wishes for a safe voyage for his friend (8.251D-252D). In phrases that recall the recommendations of Menander Rhetor (third century CE) for concluding a logos propemptikos (2.398.29-399.10) he hopes that Salutius’ journey will be an easy one and that he will be received with joy wherever he goes. He looks forward to the day of reunion—which underscores that Julian sees their alliance as durable.

Friendship

As previously noted, the continuities between the picture Julian draws of his friendship with Salutius and the ideals of friendship elaborated by Aristotle have been touched on in prior scholarship.\(^20\) I will now substantiate these continuities further in the interests of emphasizing how much of Aristotle is present in Julian’s proffered model of friendship in this oration. This substantiation will place in sharp relief Julian’s departure from the Aristotelian model when he has recourse to erotics—a departure that would have been recognized by his educated audience.

The reader of Oration 4 soon discovers that Julian sees his friendship with Salutius as chiefly founded on moral excellence (ἀρετή) and secondarily on the way in which they have been of use to each other. The following passage features most of the commonalities Julian’s conception has with Aristotle’s ideals (and is therefore a good place to start):

> Ἀλλὰ τούτου μὲν ἐξ ἰσης, ὡς οἰκε, κοινωνοῦμεν, σὺ μὲν ύπερ ἡμῶν ἀλγῶν μόνον, ἐγὼ δὲ ἂεὶ ποθὸν τὴν σὴν συνουσίαν καὶ τὴς φιλίας μεμημένος, ἢν ἐκ τῆς ἀρετῆς μὲν μάλιστα καὶ προηγουμένος, ἔπειτα καὶ διὰ τὴν χρείαν, ἢν οὐκ ἐγὼ μὲν σοί, σὺ δὲ ἐμοὶ συνεχῶς παρέσχες, ἀνακραθέντες ἀλλήλοις ὁμολογήσαμεν, οὕς ὅρκους οὐδὲ τοιαύταις ἀνόγκαιρας τάντα πιστοῦμενοι, ἃς περ ὁ Θησεὺς καὶ ὁ Πειρίθοος, ἀλλ' ἐξ ὅν ἂεὶ ταῦτα νοοῦμεν ἑαυτοῖς καὶ προαιροῦμενοι . . .

(Julian. Or. 4.2.242C-D)

We are partners equally in this [i.e., the pain this separation is causing]—you grieving only on my behalf and I both missing your company and remembering our friendship, emphatically and chiefly based on ἀρετή, and secondarily on its usefulness which I to you, and you to me, have continually provided—[this friendship] which we, having compacted it, swore to each other, not relying on oaths and such ties (as did Theseus and Perithoos) but through always thinking and choosing the same things . . .

The first thing to note is that the foundation of their friendship is ἀρετή (a sentiment that Julian echoes later in the words he gives to Pericles at 5.247D, 5.248A). The importance of ἀρετή reflects the ideals of friendship as elaborated by Aristotle, who declares on a number of occasions that the best friendship is one based on ἀρετή (see, e.g., Eth. Eud. 7.2.1236B 1, 7.2.1237A 29-31, 7.2.1238A 30f.; Eth. Nic. 8.1.1155A 1-6), which he is at pains to distinguish from friendships that are based solely on utility or pleasure (see, e.g., Eth. Nic. 8.3.1156A 7-19 and Eth. Eud. 7.2.1236A 15-1236B 1). Seeming perhaps to run against this formulation of Aristotle, Julian here (and again at 3.243B) also characterizes his connection with Salutius as a χρεία, a thing of use or advantage, that benefits both of them. Furthermore, Julian elsewhere underscores the pleasure he receives from his friendship with Salutius saying that κοινωνήσαντας γὰρ ἡμᾶς ἀλλήλοις . . . πολλῶν δὲ ἡδέων ἔργων τε καὶ λόγων . . . κοινὸν εὑρίσκεσθαι χρῆ τῶν παρόντων . . . παιωνικόν ἄκος (“it is necessary for us, who have shared with each other many pleasant deeds and words to discover a shared remedy in the present circumstances,” 1.240B) and he complains that Salutius’ departure will render him μόνης . . . θαλπωρής τε καὶ τέρψεως ἐνδείξας (“bereft of his sole comfort and pleasure,” 3.243C). These other details may seem to suggest that Julian is portraying his and Salutius’ friendship in terms of the two lesser friendships that Aristotle identifies, that is, those based on pleasure and use.21 But drawing this conclusion would be a mistake. Aristotle identifies pleasure and use as operative in friendships of the best kind declaring ἡδέως δὲ καὶ χρήσιμως ἄμα εὑρήσαι ὅτι ὁ σπουδάσας (“that the good/serious man [who is one to seek for a friend most of all] is said to be pleasant and useful, Eth. Nic. 8.6.1158A 34f.”).22

---

We can see further continuities between Julian’s and Aristotle’s conceptions of friendship in this passage. At the beginning of the passage quoted above (2.242C-D), Julian says that he and Salutius are partners in grief. The verb at issue, κοινωνέω, and the related noun (κοινωνία) and adjective (κοινός) occur often in Julian’s oration (1.240A, 1.240B, 2.241C, 2.241D, 2.242A, 2.242C, 4.245A, 4.245B, 4.245D, 8.252C) and their occurrence marks another continuity with Aristotle.23 Aristotle states quite directly that friendship is κοινωνία, a “partnership” or “community” (κοινωνία . . . ἡ φιλία, Eth. Nic. 9.12.1171B 32f.; cf. Eth. Nic. 8.12.1161B 11; Eth. Eud. 7.9.1241B 11-19, 7.10.1242A 19-22). The frequent occurrence of these words also connects the oration to Pythagoras’ notions of communality (a connection which Julian makes explicitly in the oration [see 4.245A, 7.251C-D]). A final continuity with Aristotle to note in the passage above is the presence of a tension between difference and sameness. Julian says that he and Salutius are equal partners in dismay over their separation. But what follows are words that assert difference: Salutius grieves on Julian’s behalf while Julian pines for and ruminates on the companionship his friend provided. Explicitly directed toward his friend, Julian’s affect is arguably more lavish than Salutius’. This disparity is a function of the difference in status between the two of them and provides a further instance of the influence of Aristotle. Aristotle remarks, ἐν πάσαις δὲ ταῖς ἀνομοιοειδεσί φιλίαις τὸ ἀνάλογον ἰσάζει καὶ σφίζει τὴν φιλίαν (“in all friendships based on dissimilarity, what is proportionate equalizes and preserves the friendship,” Eth. Nic. 9.1.1163B 29f.).\(^{24}\) The status differential between Salutius and Julian drives Julian in the direction of more overt display of affection as a sort of balance.\(^{25}\) And this would not be the only time that Julian opted for a display of affection that ran counter to the protocols of deportment befitting a man of his status. Ammianus Marcellinus relates how Julian rushed out from the senate and greeted the philosopher Maximus enthusiastically and forgot what, Ammianus says, were the proper canons of imperial dignity.\(^{26}\) The positions he held—first Caesar and then Augustus—and, \(^{24}\) Cf. Eth. Nic. 8.13.1162 2-4: τοὺς ἰσούς μὲν κατ’ ἴσοτητα δεῖ τῷ φιλεῖν καὶ τοῖς λοιποῖς ἵσαζειν, τοὺς δ’ ἀνίσους τὸ ἀνάλογον ταῖς ὑπεροχαῖς ἀποδιδόναι (“equals will need to keep things equal and strictly so, in terms of loving and everything else, while unequals will need to render what is proportionate to the superiority of one of the parties in each case”).

---

\(^{25}\) Menander Rhetor writes that a logos propemptikos addressed to an equal or to a social inferior who is a friend will avoid the giving of advice (which is suggestive of hierarchy) and instead will feature a display of affection: ἐτέρος δὲ τρόπος ἂν γένοιτο, ἐν δὲ διυνήσει τις ἐνδειξισθαι ἢς ἔρωτικὸν καὶ διαπτυρον περὶ τὸν προπεμψόμενον, συμβουλὴν μὴ καταμιγνύς, τῆς ἄξιας ὑπαρχούσης ἐφομιλλού καὶ τῆς δόξης ἴσης τῷ προπέμποντι καὶ τῷ προπεμμένῳ, ὡς ὅταν ἐταίρος ἐταίρον προπέμπῃ καὶ γὰρ εἰ βελτιών εἰπ ὁ προπέμπων ἑνταῦθα τοῦ ἀπαίροντος, ἀλλ’ ὅλῃ τῇ κοινωνίᾳ τὸν ὀνόματος καὶ τὸ ἀμφοτέρους εἶναι φίλους ἀφαιρεῖτα τῷ ἄξιομα τῆς συμβουλῆς τὸν λέγοντα (“There would be another type [of logos propemptikos] in which the speaker will be able to express a passionate [ἔρωτικὸν] and ardent attitude to the departing person without the addition of advice; this is when the reputation and position of the two parties are equal, e.g., when a comrade sees off a comrade [ἐταῖρος ἐταίρον προπέμπῃ]. Even if the speaker in these circumstances is superior to the person who is going away, nevertheless the common title, the fact that both are friends [φίλοις], deprives him of his advisory status,” 2.395.12-20; trr. Russell and Wilson [2] 127 [adapted]). Oration 4 fits these comments on the logos propemptikos well. Julian finesses the difference in status between himself and Salutius through a desirous attitude, an emphasis on their friendship, and titles, e.g., ἐταίρος, that stress equality.

\(^{26}\) Res Gestae 22.7.3f.: Frequentabat inter haec curiam agendo diversa, quae divisiones multiplices ingerebant. et cum die quodam ei causas ibi spectanti venisse nuntiatus esset ex Asia philosophus Maximus, exsiluit indecor et, qui esset, oblitus effuso cursu a vestibulo of course, his being a member of the house of Constantine—should have kept him from behaving as he did with Maximus as far as Ammianus is concerned, and, we may speculate, from displaying the apparently lavish informality that is in evidence in this oration.

Looking beyond the passage hitherto under discussion and out into the oration as a whole, a reader will discover a further connection with Aristotle’s notion of the friend, namely, that a friend is often a comrade or ἕταιρος. Aristotle remarks at one point, συνδιαγείν δὲ μετ’ ἀλληλῶν οὐκ ἔστι μὴ ἥδεις οὐνας μηδὲ χαίροντας τοῖς αὐτοῖς, ὅπερ ἴ ἕταιρικη δοκεῖ ἐξειν (“it is not possible for people to live with one another if they are not pleasant and do not rejoice in the same things, as is the case with the friendship of comrades (ἕταιρικη [sc. φιλία]),” Ἐθ. Νικ. 8.5.1157Β 22-24; cf. Ἐθ. Νικ. 8.11.1161Α 25-27, 8.12.1162Α 9-11, 9.2.1165Α 29f., 9.10.1171Α 14f.; Ἐθ. Ευδ. 7.10.1242Α 1-5, 7.10.1242Α 35-40). The reader will recall that Julian says that he and Salutius always think and choose the same things. Furthermore, Salutius is most assuredly Julian’s ἕταιρος. Julian addresses him directly as ὁ φίλε ἕταιρε (“dear comrade,” 1.240Α). Indeed ἕταιρος appears in a paraphrase Julian makes from Plato (Ἐπ. 7.325Δ), where it is noted that it is difficult to govern the state and, ἀνευ φιλῶν ἀνδρῶν καὶ ἕταιρων πιστῶν οἶν τε εἶναι πράττειν (“without estimable friends and trusted comrades it is not possible to act,” 3.243Α). In the speech he gives Pericles, Julian has him call Anaxagoras τὸν ἀριστον . . . τῶν ἕταιρων (“the best of comrades,” 5.246Β). Finally, we read ἕταιρος in the company of an injunction to Salutius that he continue to cherish Julian (and note also the presence of κοινωνία and φίλος): στέργων δὲ ἡμῖς ἥκιστα ποθήσεις ἀνδρὸς ἕταιρον καὶ φίλου πιστοῦ κοινωνίαν (“keeping your regard for me constant, it is my desire that you never miss having partnership [κοινωνίαν] with an estimable comrade [ἐταίρον] and trustworthy friend [φίλον],” 8.252C). Camaraderie also shows through in the various terms Julian applies to Salutius (the preposition σὸν in each of these terms underscores the togetherness of comrades): Salutius is Julian’s συνασπιστής (“fellow-shieldsman,” 2.242A), his συνεργός (“fellow-worker,” 3.242D) and his συναγωνιστής (“partner-in-endeavor,” 7.251C).

Late-Ancient and Julianic Innovations

As said above, this friendship between Julian and Salutius exceeds the Aristotelian model in a key way when Julian uses erotic tropes in his presentation of it. Instead of being careful to distinguish the friendship from an erotic connection which it in some ways resembles, Julian’s proffered friendship creates questions on just this basis. Julian’s strategies lead the reader to wonder if there is any distinction between this friendship and an erotic relationship. Julian creates these questions in the first instance through reference to Plato’s Charmides and Theocritus’ Idyll 12 and then makes these questions more insistent through indirect and then direct statements of his inability to live up to his forebears in the matter of self-control. As said above, a mask seems to slip and the sexual tropes seem to acquire constative force; Julian creates the suspicion that he is not speaking metaphorically but is in fact describing a reality, as will be shown below. In any case, this figuring of friendship in pederastic/same-sex sexual terms is comparable to what we read in other texts in late antiquity.

Writing in his twenty-second oration in, perhaps, the 360s or 370s, Themistius depicts the acquisition of friends in erotic terms. In this oration, entitled significantly for the present purposes “On Friendship,” Themistius speaks of men who are devoted to friendship not as competing with one another (as often happens when a woman is at issue; Them. Or. 22.266C) but as discovering what they want in each other:

27 Speaking of Cato, Plato and Democritus at 4.245C-D, Julian notes that they undertook journeys on which they travelled alone, leaving behind συνήθεις (“intimates,” 4.245C). Hence, then, Salutius is by implication α συνήθεις.

28 I stress again and will reiterate below that the creation of suspicion of actual desire is a rhetorical strategy. While there may be a reality of actual desire underneath the representation, this possible reality is unavailable to us.

29 There is no consensus about the date of Oration 22 (see R. Penella, The Private Orations of Themistius [Berkeley 2000] 18).
Only those in love with friendship do not fight with one another over possession of it, but straightaway they discover their beloved boy in each other.

The metaphor for the discovered thing of desire is most assuredly sexual. The beloved boy, τὰ παιδικά, is roughly synonymous with the ἐρώμενος of Athenian pederasty. A similar dynamic is present in the somewhat later Vita Pauli of Jerome. In section 9, St. Antony is outside St. Paul’s hermitage, begging to come in and sounding for all the world like a locked-out lover:

Qui sim, unde, cur venerim, nosti. Scio me non mereri conspectum tuum, tamen nisi videro, non recedam. Qui bestias suscipis, hominem cur repellis? Quaesivi, et inveni, pulso ut aperiatur; quod si non impetro, hic, hic moriar ante postes tuos: certe sepelies vel cadaver.

(Jer. Vita Pauli 9)

You know quite well who I am, from where and why I have come. I know that I don’t deserve to see you. All the same I will not leave until I see you. You who welcome beasts, why do you repel a man? I have sought and I have found; I pound so that it may be opened. And if I do not get what I seek, here—here!—I shall die at your doorstep. You will certainly then bury a corpse at least.

Citing prior scholarship that sees Antony “playing Romeo to Paul’s Juliet,” Burrus persuasively suggests that these opening moves of the eventual communion of these two saints are an “almost parodically groping rite of courtship.” Indeed, as it is the case that Antony is complaining outside the locked door of his desired one, a reader will be thinking of the many paraclausithyra in the erotic poetry of previous centuries. The repetition of “here” (hic, hic) certainly recall Roman elegy.

Similar to what we read in Themistius and Jerome, Julian uses pederastic and same-sex sexual desire to talk about his friendship with Salutius. I will now discuss the two examples in the oration of intertextual evocation of pederastic

---

30 For more on Themistius’ Oration 22, see Konstan [17 (Leiden 1996)] 16-19; Penella [29] 16-18.

32 Furthermore, when Antony threatens suicide if he is not admitted, Jerome’s text recalls a scene of boyish cruelty to the importuning lover exemplified by Theocritus’ Idyll 23. In this poem, the lover, having been driven to utter despair by rejection, commits suicide by hanging himself outside the locked door of the boy’s house (49-52).
and same-sex desire. In the first example, it is arguable that Julian makes reference to Theocritus’ Idyll 12. This poem is an amorous address by a mature male to a younger male on the occasion of the latter’s return after a few days’ absence. It is a work that Julian quotes on two other occasions in his works.\(^{33}\)

Here is the passage containing the reference:

‘Τί πρῶτον; τί δ’ ἔπειτα; τί δ’ ὑστάτιον καταλέξω;’ πότερον ως ὁ Σκηπτῆσι εἰκεῖνος, ὁ τὸν Δαίλιον ἀγαπήσας καὶ φιλήθεις τὸ λεγόμενον ἵσῳ ζυγῷ παλιν, ήδεως μὲν αὐτῷ συνήν, ἐπραπτε δὲ οὐδὲν ὅν μὴ πρότερον εἰκεῖνος πῦθοιτο καὶ φησειν εἶναι πρακτέον;

(Julian. Or. 4.4.244C-D)

“What is the first thing I will recount? What next and what last?”\(^{34}\) How the famous Scipio—who loved Laelius and was loved by him in return, as the saying goes, “under an equal yoke”—[how Scipio] spent time pleasantly with him and how he did not do anything before [Laelius] was apprised of it and he said it needed to be done?

At this point in the oration, Julian is beginning his survey of famous pairs of men in history with Scipio Aemilianus (185/184-129 BCE) and his friend Laelius—a survey which will climax with Pericles and Anaxagoras. A relationship with structural similarity to that between Julian and Salutius, the friendship of these earlier Romans of different status nonetheless featured equal affection. The portion of this passage that has our particular interest is the phrase ἴσῳ ζυγῷ (“under an equal yoke”). As Wright points out in the Loeb edition, this recalls line 15 of Theocritus’ Idyll 12. Here are the lines that contain the reference:

εἴθ’ ὄμαλοι πνεὺσειαν ἐπ’ ἀμφότεροισιν ἔρωτες νόην, ἐπησσιμένοις δὲ γενόμεθα πάσιν ἀοιδῆ; ‘διὸ δὴ τινὲς μετὰ προτέρους γενέσθην φῶθ’, δ’ μὲν εἰσπνῆλος, φαίνῃ χ’ Ομυκλαίαξων, τὸν δ’ ἔτερον πάλιν, ως κεν ὁ Θεσσαλὸς εἴποι, αίτην. ἀλλήλους δ’ ἐφίλησαν ἵσῳ ζυγῷ, ἤ ρα τότ’ ἰσαν χρύσειοι πάλιν ἀνδρές, δὲ ἀντεφίλησ’ ὁ φιλήθεις.

(Theoc. Id. 12.10-16)

Oh that equal loves should breathe upon us two and that all those who are to be have a song about us: “Divine were these two mortals in earlier days, the one the inspirer, as one speaking the speech of Amyclae would say, and the other the hearer, as a Thessalian would put it. They loved (ἐφίλησαν) each other under an equal yoke (ἵσῳ ζυγῷ). Indeed in truth were men golden again

---

\(^{33}\) In Epistle 96 (Bidez) / 52 (Wright) at 374C Julian refers directly to line two, and in Misopogon at 3.338D he has occasion to cite line 32.

\(^{34}\) Julian quotes Odyssey 9.14 (though not completely correctly): Τι πρῶτον τοι ἔπειτα, τί δ’ υστάτιον καταλέξω;
Comparing Julian’s text to that of Theocritus, the reader will note that not only is the phrase ἴσῳ ζυγῷ echoed, forms of the verb φιλέω appear three times and the adverb πάλιν once. Even though Julian says that the phrase is proverbial ("as the saying goes"), it would seem that he is putting down enough of Theocritus’ poem into the surrounding text that an educated reader (whom we may certainly assume for the oration) would connect it to Theocritus’ poem and sense Julian adding a pederastic complexion to the friendship of Scipio and Laelius, and hence to that between himself and Salutius. A reader would not only be aided by his experience of Alexandrian poetry in forming this opinion, in the section prior to this one Julian makes explicit reference to a notorious passage from Plato which would prime a reader to make this particular connection. Arguably invoking Socrates’ asserted inability to maintain his composure when he was confronted by Charmides’ beauty, Julian then ostentatiously regrets the inclusion in his own oration of this reference to Plato as, he says, the reference has turned out to be something destructive to representation, something too real.

35 Taking Julian at his word that the words ἴσῳ ζυγῷ are proverbial, J. Bouffartigue [15] 260f. believes that there is no reason to suppose that Julian had it in mind to be quoting Theocritus’ Idyll 12 at this point. As has been shown, more of Theocritus’ text seems to be influencing the prose around the “proverbial” bit and this in turn strongly suggests that Julian was in fact quoting the poem (and that his readers were likely to recognize him doing so). I am not denying, of course, that the phrase ἴσῳ ζυγῷ had acquired by late antiquity proverbial status. As A. Gow, Theocritus 2 [Cambridge 1952] 224 points out, we find the phrase, or near recollections of it, in sources Greek (Nicander, Theriaca 908; Theaetetes Scholasticus, AP 10.16.3) and Latin (Horace, Carm. 1.35.28; Propertius 3.25.8; Pliny the Younger, Ep. 3.9.8). To this list I add from the fourth century an instance of the phrase itself in Paulinus’ epistle to his friend Ausonius (C. 11.38-40 in W. A. Hartel and M. Kamptner (edd.), Sancti Pontii Meropii Paulini Nolani 30 [Vienna 1999]; Ep. 30.38-40 in H. G. E. White (ed.), Ausonius 2 [London 1921]: vix Tullius et Maro tecum / sustineant aequale iugum. si iugar amore, / hoc tantum tibi me iactare audebo iugalem ["with difficulty would Cicero or Virgil hold up an equal yoke with you. If I will be yoked in love, on this basis alone will I dare to boast that I am your yoke-mate"]). I also draw the reader’s attention to the playful use of the word yoke (iugum)—and the related verb and adjective (iugo and iugalis)—seven times in lines 30-48 of this poem and to the wordplay involving iugum and the related adjective in Ausonius’ Ep. 24: see lines 1, 8, 15, 18, 40, 61, 82 (R. P. H. Green [ed.], The Works of Ausonius [Oxford 1991])—the letter to which Paulinus was responding. Note also that Ausonius has occasion to mention Laelius and Scipio (Ep. 24.37) in the context of discussion of his friendship with Paulinus.
When speaking earlier of the pain that the separation from Salutius is causing him, Julian wonders if the spells of Zamolxis, which helped the handsome Charmides (in Plato’s dialogue of the same name) will help him:

Τι ποτε οὖν ἄρα χρή διανοηθέντα καὶ τίνας ἐπωδάζεις εὐρόντα πείσαι πρόως ἔχειν ὑπὸ τοῦ πάθους θορυβουμένην τὴν ψυχήν; ἄρα ἡμῖν οἱ Ζαμολξίδος εἰσὶ μιμητέοι λόγοι, καὶ αἱ ἕκ Θράκης ἐπιθανέ, ὡς Ἀθηναῖε ἂν ἔρευν ὁ Σωκράτης πρὸ τοῦ τὴν οὐδόνην ἴασθαι τῆς κεφαλῆς ἐπάθειν ἤξιον τῷ καλῷ Χαρμίδη; ἢ τούτους μὲν ἀτε δὴ μείζονας καὶ περὶ μειζόναν οὐ κινητέον, ὅσπερ ἐν θεάτρῳ μικρῷ μηχανάς μεγάλας . . .

(Julian. Οr. 4.3.244A)

What must I think now? What spells must I discover to persuade my soul, which has been disturbed by passion, to bear up with composure? Must I act out the words of Zamolxis and the spells from Thrace, which Socrates, bringing to Athens, deemed worthy to sing over handsome Charmides prior to curing his headache. Or are these words, inasmuch as they are greater and are about greater things, not to be set in motion, as though they were great stage machinery in a small theater. . . .

Coming on the heels of Julian’s worry about how he is going to bear up without his friend (indeed, at 3.243D, Julian says that regret over this separation makes him think of suicide), Julian calls to mind Plato’s Charmides. Would the spells of Zamolxis which Socrates affected to bring to Charmides help him deal with the pain of this separation? In order to gauge the effects of this intertextuality, we must examine the Charmides more closely.

Shortly after the dialogue begins, Socrates, Chaerephon and Critias are talking about Critias’ handsome cousin Charmides, who shortly arrives and becomes one of the interlocutors in the dialogue. When Charmides arrives, all the men and boys in the scene are transfixed by the intensity of Charmides’ good looks. Chaerephon at this point addresses Socrates:

36 Julian also mentions Zamolxis twice in his satire of his predecessors, Caesares. At 4.309C, Zeno is able to make Octavian wise and temperate providing spells (ἐπωδαζεις) of the kind that Zamolxis used to employ and, at 28.327D, Julian mentions that Zamolxis was an illustrious ancestor of the Goths.

37 Jean Bouffartigue [15] 177 is skeptical that Julian would have seen and is relying on his audience having read the actual text of the Charmides. I see no reason to consider this case made, indeed I find it puzzling that Julian, who is one of the minor figures of late Platonism, has to be declared functionally ignorant of Plato. As Bouffartigue’s own analysis shows, Julian makes reference to eighteen of Plato’s works in a total of eighty-one references. But even granting that Julian acquired the passage in question through a handbook or from a life of Socrates, this text would have often fallen into the hands of those who would have known the Charmides firsthand.
“What does the young man look like to you, Socrates?” [Chaerephon] said.
“Handsome face, no?”
“Supernatural.” I said.
“Yet,” he continued, “if he should be willing to disrobe, you will utterly forget his face, so all-beautiful is he as regards his form.”

Confronted with such physical beauty, Socrates decides characteristically that it is time to sublimate. He asks: Ti oûn, ëfhn, oûk àpedûsamen aûtò aûtò toûto kai ètheasáméthta próteron toû eîdous; (“So—why haven’t we stripped this very part of him [i.e., his mind] and formed a complete picture of it before his form?”), 154E). But Socrates’ suggested strategy of bypassing consideration of the body to the more reputable evaluation of a virtuous mind’s beauty is, as it turns out, not so easy to put into practice. In order to get close to the object of his interest, Socrates takes up the suggestion that he pretend to be in possession of a cure for a headache Charmides had on the previous day. Learning that a cure for his headache is at hand, Charmides gives Socrates such a look that it discountenances the voluble philosopher (ëneblediæn té moi toîs ôrðhalmwís òmîhçhôwîn ti oûn, “he gazed upon me [Socrates] with a somehow irresistible look,” 155C-D). Then, as he teeters off balance because of this full-on inquisitive look from the handsome Charmides, Socrates inadvertently catches provocative sight of what’s inside Charmides’ cloak:

Seemingly struggling with desire, Socrates explains that while he was on campaign he learned of spells from one of the doctors of the Thracian king, Zamolxis:
[The Thracian doctor] said, “But Zamolxis, our king, who is a god, says, that just as one must not treat the eyes while excluding the head nor the head without the body, so one must not treat the body without taking the soul into consideration . . . the soul . . . is treated with certain spells. These spells are beautiful words. Through the agency of these sorts of words, temperance (σωφροσύνη) is born in souls. And if temperance has been born within and is present, it is easy at that moment to provide health to the head and the rest of the body.” And so, while teaching me the remedy and the spells he said, “Let no one, who would not offer his soul to be treated with the spell first, persuade you to treat his head with this remedy.”

After this, as it turns out, successful conversational gambit, Socrates proceeds to explore the nature of σωφροσύνη with Charmides throughout the rest of the dialogue. As the discussion proves to be inconclusive, the awkwardness and aphasia that temporarily afflict Socrates prefigure the contours of the remainder of this work. The question for us here is how the reader should understand Julian’s evocation of this work of Plato that features philosophical fumbling in the face of beauty’s irresistible glances and an all-beautiful physique.

I suggest two ways to interpret this reference to the Charmides and in the end it seems that the reader is best off keeping both in mind. On the one hand, Julian invokes the spells of Zamolxis as a means to ease his own pain at his separation from his friend. This particular invocation has the effect of making Julian into the handsome Charmides, an object of desire. But since, on the other hand, Julian observes that he is the one who may have to act out these words, it appears that Julian is to be seen as Socrates also—the desiring one. The net result of this flexibility on the part of Julian (and, by implication, on the part of Salutius) is a problematization of the pederastic norms of ἐρωτής and ἔρωμένος as the asymmetry that was generally asserted for these relationships is not present. The erasure of asymmetry that this Platonic allusion brings to the fore fits with Julian’s elsewhere attested interest in not insisting on personal grandeur and sharply-marked status distinctions in his relations with intimates (discussed above) and it also harmonizes with Julian’s drive to equalize the friendship through the invocation of τὸ ἀνάλογον ("what is proportionate") as Aristotle puts it (Eth. Nic. 9.1.1163B 29f.; also discussed above). A picture of symmetrical desire between adult males emerges from this moment of intertextuality. My suggestion that such desire is perceptible may impress some present readers as unwarranted. I offer again the final words of a passage discussed above (and which were the frontispiece of this article) in support of the idea that this desire in fact is visible (my second offering, a discussion of why Julian might want to suggest the presence of same-sex and age-consonant desire, will appear in the conclusion of this article):

..., ἢ τούτως [sc. μιμητέοι λόγοι] μὲν ἀτε δὴ μείζονας καὶ περὶ μείζονον οὐ κινητέον, ὥσπερ ἐν θεάτρῳ μικρὸ μηχανὰς μεγάλας...

(Julian. Or. 3.244A)

..., or are these [words to be acted out], inasmuch as they are greater and are about greater things, not to be set in motion, as though they were great stage machinery in a small theater...

Through these words Julian affects to regret his recollection of the Charmides in his own oration. These words, however, are difficult. Although Julian does offer an explanation—he calls the words to be acted out, the μιμητέοι λόγοι, expansive and concerned with weighty affairs, similar to stage machinery that will prove to be too large for the theater into which it has been put—and it is not clear what his (initially) abstracting and (subsequently) metaphorical language means. A generalizing statement about size? A sort of similarity to oversized stage machinery?

When Socrates remarks that he would like to strip the mind of Charmides rather than his body, he figures dialectic as foreplay and thereby embraces the physical at a figurative level. And then, shortly thereafter, the pretensions of the philosopher to a mode of speech sovereign enough to metaphorize dialectic as foreplay are themselves stripped away. After the physical has asserted itself, an at best inconclusive discussion of σωφροσύνη eventuates: the body arguably wins in this dialogue (although the existence of his own irony will ever immunize Socrates from a charge of intemperance or ἀκράτεια). In similar fashion Julian makes reference to this story from the Platonic corpus but then declares that it is unable to play its role as a metaphor for his grief, presumably similar to the way stage machinery that is too big for a small theater destroys the illusion on stage and attracts all credence to itself. Julian says here that the mechanism he uses to metaphorize his grief will not, under the present circumstances, stably remain a medium of representation but will instead designate itself and thereby express actual male/male desire: the use of sexual desire as a mode of representation fails as signifier and signified are rendered identical. Indeed, the reader of Aristophanes’ story in the Symposium will recall that Zeus gave the comfort of sexual intercourse to the beings that he had sliced in half through the μηχανή of moving the genitals to the front.39 This change of bodily morphology—a μηχανή just as the stage machines Julian mentions are μηχαναί—enabled both sex between men and women and that between men and men, as Plato goes on to say (Smp. 191C). Furthermore, Julian indirectly says here that Socrates’ ironic pose in relation to such physical incitements is not one that Julian can strike and he thus cannot measure up to the accomplishments of his philosophical forebear. At this moment, at least, philosophical distance and ironic detachment are not his possessions. He seems to let his mask slip, as it were, and the reader wonders whether Julian is really feeling desire. As previously stressed, I do not regard the appearance of desire here, in the first place, as saying anything definitive about what Julian and Salutius may have done with one another. Second—and this issue is independent of the first, no matter what the facts of the case are—Julian uses an apparent confession of inability in the face of desire as yet another strategy in his ongoing presentation to all who would read or hear this oration that his friendship and alliance with Salutius is a special thing. This will not be the only occasion when Julian uses same-sex sexual erotics in this way.

---

38 Julian is well-aware of Socratic irony. In Oration 7 (24/237B) Julian notes that Socrates is by his nature ironic (ὁ Σωκράτης εἰρων ὄν φύσει).

Later in the oration, a similar dynamic attends the speech Julian puts in the mouth of Pericles. When the speech of this golden-age figure concludes, the words Julian offers in sua persona constitute another moment in which Julian showcases his inability to accomplish what a forebear is able to accomplish—and, significantly, it is again a seeming failure of sublimation in the face of male/male erotics.

Pericles’ Ability and Julian’s Inability

The end of the speech of Pericles climaxes with what we can read as an anachronistic replay of Plato’s “ladder of love” from the Symposium. Here is this passage from Pericles’ speech to Anaxagoras in Julian’s oration:

39 Plato, Smp. 191B: ἐλέησας δὲ ὃ Ζεύς ἄλλην μηχανήν πορίζεται, καὶ μετατίθησιν αὐτῶν τὰ αἰδώς εἰς τὸ πρόσθεν . . . (“Filled with pity [for the separated beings who were dying of grief] Zeus devised another μηχανή and he moved their genitals to the front . . .”).
But at the same time nothing prevents our seeing each other [although we may be apart]; I do not mean our flesh and sinews and “bodily outline and chest in the likeness” [Eur. Phoen. 162] of the bodily original—though perhaps there is no reason why these too should not become visible in our minds—but I mean our virtue, our deeds and words (λόγους), the intercourse and conversations that we so often had with one another, when in perfect harmony we sang the praises of education and justice and the mind governing mortal and human affairs; when too we discussed the art of government and laws (νόμων), the ways of virtue, and the noblest practices (ἐπιτηδευμάτων), everything in short that occurred to us when, as occasion served, we mentioned these subjects. Thinking on these things, nourishing ourselves on these images [of such abstract notions as virtue or government], perhaps we will not give ourselves over to the images of nocturnal dreams and sense perception (shamefully composed from the body’s physical constitution) will not attack the mind with empty and vain visions (φαντάσματα). We will not allow sense perception to serve and labor for us. Having fled sense perception, the mind will practice those things I have mentioned, motivated for the observation of and habituation to those things that are incorporeal. By means of mind we commune with he who is greater and [by means of mind] we were born to see and love/desire (ἔραν) things that have fled sense perception and are widely separated in space, or, I should say, that have no need of space: that is to say, all of us who have lived so as to deserve such a vision, conceiving it in our minds and uniting ourselves with it.40

Pericles proceeds in familiar Platonic terms as he starts from the individual body (his and Anaxagoras’) and then proceeds to draw a picture of ever more secure investment in virtues more and more disembodied. Enlightened in this way, a man thereby possesses an ability both to remain impassive to bodily stimuli and to avoid, it would seem, nocturnal emissions. The privileging of mind over sense perception is underscored and humanity’s highest goal is found in the intellection of things incorporeal and transcendent, and, indeed, in the love of these things (which reinscribes the fact that the springboard of this transcendence is desire).

Certainly perceptible to all who would have had the benefit of the paideia in late antiquity, the resemblance between this passage and the so-called “ladder of love” in the Symposium (210A-211C) is strong. Present in both Julian’s and Plato’s writing is the conversion of interest focused on a single male body into a broader investment in the institutions of society. The final phrases that Julian gives to Pericles (e.g., the references to desired incorporeals that need no space at all) nicely adumbrate “the vast sea of beauty” (τὸ πολὺ πέλαγος . . . τοῦ καλοῦ, Smp. 210D) Diotima proposes for a successful sublimator in the Symposium. There are perceptible verbal echoes too. Julian speaks of λόγοι (247D), νόμοι (248A) and ἐπιτηδεύματα (248A) which we may correlate with Plato’s mention of λόγοι (210A, 210C, 210D, 211A), νόμοι (210C), and ἐπιτηδεύματα (210C [twice], 210D, 211C [twice]).

Pericles’ version of the ladder of love shows some difference from Plato’s though. On the way up to beauty’s vast sea, the striving climber clammers out onto the ledge of asceticism and self-mastery for a time—a detour that surely indicates the late-ancient provenance of these words. And this impression of a late-ancient provenance is redoubled by the seeming mention of erotic dreams with nocturnal emissions (“images of nocturnal dreams . . . empty and vain visions”), which were a concern in the writings on dreams, in medical treatises, and in discussions of practicalities of Christian asceticism in late antiquity.41

I will now demonstrate that nocturnal emissions are arguably perceptible in the passage through a brief survey of these literatures. The benefit of making this demonstration is that it shows Julian praising Pericles’ ability to rise above the distractions of the body, while he (Julian) continues to be assailed by fant£σματα that are arguably causing nocturnal emissions whose impetus is Salutius. Here, for reference, is the passage in which Pericles remarks that devotion to abstract things of virtue will enable him and Anaxagoras to avoid being influenced by these nightly dreams:

Ταύτα ἐννοουόντες, τοῦτοις στρεφόμενοι τοῖς εἰδώλοις, τυχόν οὐκ ὁνείρων νυκτερινῶν ἱνδάλμασι προσέξομεν, οὐδὲ κενὰ καὶ μάταια προσβαλεῖ τῷ νόθο φαντάσματα πονηρῶς ὑπὸ τῆς τοῦ σώματος κράσεως αἰσθησίς διακειμένη.

(Julian, Or. 4.5.248A)

Thinking on these things, nourishing ourselves on these images [of such abstract notions as virtue or government], perhaps we will not give ourselves over to the images of nocturnal dreams (ὁνείρων νυκτερινῶν ἱνδάλμασι)

41 Both Wright [2] 185 and Bidez [2] 199 report that the phrase, ὁνείρων νυκτερινῶν ἱνδάλμασι (“images of nocturnal dreams”) was designated by Nauck as a quotation from an anonymous tragedy (fr. 108). If there is intertextuality with an unknown tragedy here, a relation whose force is utterly lost to us now, this relation does not vitiate the power of the other surrounding words that speak of the shameful effects of the body on the imagination. This passage remains, in any case, intertextual with the literature on erotic dreams.
and sense perception (shamefully [πονηρός] composed from the body’s physical constitution) will not attack the mind with empty and vain visions (κενὰ καὶ μάταια . . . φαντάσματα).

In the first place, the final phrase Pericles uses here, “empty and vain visions,” can be associated with erotic dreams that one has while sleeping. In a lengthy work from the second century CE on the interpretation of dreams, the Oneirokritika, Artemidorus is concerned with the meaning that dreams can be said to have. Not all dreams, however, are meaningful; Artemidorus finds that some of them, which he calls ἐνύπνια, merely reflect the current preoccupations of a person when he or she goes to bed: an ἐνύπνιον is, he says, ἀστήμαντον καὶ οὐδενὸς προσαγορευτικὸν (“meaningless and predicative of nothing,” Oneirokritika 4 praef. 65). Artemidorus remarks further of the ἐνύπνιον as follows:

. . . γινόμενον δὲ εξ ἐπιθυμίας ἀλόγου ἢ ύπερβάλλοντος φόβου ἢ πλησιμονῆς ἢ ἐνδείας τροφῆς, ἐνύπνιον χρῆ καλεῖν.
(Artem. Oneirokritika 4 praef. 66-68)

It is necessary to say that an enupnion comes about from an irrational desire or an overwhelming fear or satiety or lack of food.

An ἐνύπνιον either is an emanation of the non-rational part of the mind (and is, presumably, indicative of physical desire) or it is a figment arising from the current needs or concerns of the body.⁴² One might go so far to say that an ἐνύπνιον is “shamefully composed from the body’s physical constitution.” Artemidorus speaks elsewhere of ἐνύπνια, their connection to waking life, and how they can cause physical manifestations, called ὀνειρωγμοῖ, in the dreamer:

ταύτη γὰρ ὁνειρος ἐνύπνιον διαφέρει, ὧ συμβεβήκε τῷ μὲν εἶναι σημαντικὸ τῶν μελλόντων, τῷ δὲ τῶν ὄντων. σαφέστερον δ᾽ ἂν μάθοις οὕτω, τὰ ποία τῶν παθῶν προσανατρέχειν πέρικε καὶ προσανατάσσειν ἑαυτὰ τῇ ψυχῇ καὶ τοὺς ὀνειρωγμοὺς ἀποτελείν. οἷον ἀνάγκη τῶν ἑρῶν ὧν ἀνοητα ὧμα τοῖς παιδικοῖς εἶναι δοκεῖν καὶ τὸν δεδομένον ὧρᾶν ἂ δέδει, καὶ πάλιν αὖ τῶν πεινῶντα ἐσθιεῖν καὶ τὸν διψῶντα πίνειν . . .
(Artemidorus, Oneirokritika 1.1.5-12)

The enupnion differs from a dream in this way: it happens that the dream signifies future events while the enupnion signifies things in the present. But if you would learn about this with more clarity, [observe] certain of the passions by nature retrace [the day’s events], draw up beside the soul, and they bring oneirōgmoi to fruition such that the lover, as he dreams, seems of necessity to be together with his boyfriend; the one who has been in a state of fear seems to see what he fears; and, again, the hungry one seems to eat and the thirsty one seems to drink . . .

---

There are two things to understand from these remarks. In the first place, Artemidorus’ assertion that ἐνύπνια are manifestations whose origin is the day’s experiences recalls Aristotle’s characterization of the general nature of dreams. In De Insomniis, Aristotle maintains that the vast majority of dreams come from physical disturbances left over in the various sensory organs of the body from waking activities and thoughts; the images seen in dreams are mere after-images.43 The reader once again may remember “sense perception (shamefully composed from the body’s physical constitution) . . . attack[ing] the mind with empty and vain visions.” Hence, then, both the conceptual emptiness of the visions Pericles mentions and their basis in the body can be connected to Artemidorus and Aristotle on dreams.

Before leaving this passage from the Oneirokritika, there is the second point to make (and it will function as a bridge to a consideration of the light shed by the medical literature on what Julian says). Artemidorus sees these dreams as bringing about actual physical effects in the dreamer. The lover, for example, will dream of his boyfriend and this is an ἀνειρωγμός. It is difficult to decide precisely what Artemidorus means here—both because he does not specify precisely what the relationship between the ἐνύπνιον and the ἀνειρωγμός is and because ἀνειρωγμοὶ also arise, according to Artemidorus, 43 See, e.g., De Insomniis 459A 23-28: Τι δ’ ἔστι τὸ ἐνύπνιον, καὶ πῶς γίνεται, ἐκ τῶν περὶ τὸν ὕπνον συμβαίνοντος μάλιστ’ ἂν θεωρήσαιμεν. τὰ γὰρ αἰσθήματα καθ’ ἐκάστον αἰσθητήριον ἡμῖν ἐμπούσθησαν αἰσθήθησιν, καὶ τὸ γινόμενον ὑπ’ αὐτῶν πάθος οὐ μόνον ἐνυπάρχει ἐν τοῖς αἰσθητήριοις ἐνεργούσιον τῶν αἰσθήσεων ἄλλα καὶ ἀπελθοῦσι πόνος, ὧν ὅμοιοι ἦμεν. τὸν ποιήσαν, καὶ ἀπὸ τοῦν ἀνειρωγμόν μεταβαίνον ἀπὸ τὸν ἄνεμον . . . ("What a dream is, and how it occurs, we may best study from the circumstances attending sleep. For sense-objects corresponding to each sense-organ provide us with perception. And the affection produced by them persists in the sense-organs, not only while the perceptions are being actualized, but also after they have gone," D. Gallop [ed. and tr.], Aristotle on Sleep and Dreams [Peterborough 1990] 87); and 461A 25-30: καθισταμένου δὲ καὶ διακρίνομένου τοῦ αἰματος ἐν τοῖς ἐνυπνίοις, συρρόμενα τῶν αἰσθημάτων ἡ κίνησις ἄφ’ ἐκάστου τῶν αἰσθητήριον εἰρήμενα τε ποιεῖ τὰ ἐνύπνια, καὶ φαίνεσθαι τι καὶ δοκεῖν διὰ μὲν τὰ ἀπὸ τῆς ὀμοίας καταφέρομενα ὀρᾶν, διὰ δὲ τὰ ἀπὸ τῆς ὀμοίας ἀκούειν, ὀμοιοτρόπους δὲ καὶ ἀπὸ τῶν ἄλλων αἰσθητήριων . . . ("When in sanguineous animals the blood has subsided and its purer elements have separated off, the movement of sense-impressions persisting from each of the sense-organs makes the dreams coherent. Thus something is made to appear, and because of effects carried inward from vision one judges that one is seeing, or because of those from hearing, that one is hearing; and so on similarly for those from the other senses," Gallop [above, this note] 95). Cf. 460A32-B3, 461B21-23; see also Miller [42] 42-44.

from daytime fear, hunger and thirst\textsuperscript{44}—but the definition of ὀνειρωγμός as a dream with a seminal emission would have been well known to those familiar with medical literature.\textsuperscript{45} In any case, ἐνύπνια and the ὀνειρωγμοὶ are germane to this discussion because of the asserted connection between “empty” images and physical manifestations—a connection in the face of which Pericles expresses his power and Julian confesses his weakness.

The fifth-century writer of \textit{On Chronic Diseases}, Caelius Aurelianus (whose work is a Latin translation of a Greek text by Soranus who lived two or three centuries earlier), discusses nocturnal emissions at 5.7 and the terms he uses in his discussion recall those of Artemidorus, Aristotle, and, as is my assertion, Julian. A dream with a nocturnal emission is, Caelius says, an \textit{onyrogmos}.\textsuperscript{46}
Caelius also believes that wet dreams are indicative of poor health. He says, \textit{per somnos inanibus visis} \textit{adfecti aegrotantes seminis lapsu vexantur} (“those ill-ones affected by empty/vain visions \textit{(inanibus visis)} during sleep are troubled by the emission of seed,” \textit{On Chronic Diseases} 5.7.80).\textsuperscript{47} This phrase is familiar by now; conceptual emptiness is once again associated with sexual arousal that, in this case, explicitly climaxes with the emission of semen. Caelius later suggests, too, that it may be necessary to take action to cause the emissions to cease:

\begin{quote}
\textit{quapropter convenit primo aegrotanti ab intentione veneria visa mentis avterere, quae Graeci phantasmata vocaverunt.}
\end{quote}
\textit{(Caelius, On Chronic Diseases 5.7.83)}

\textsuperscript{44} I will simply note here that I find it difficult to decide how dreams of fear, hunger, and thirst will be of a kind with dreams based in sexual desire—especially when the possibility of the evidence of seminal emission is taken into consideration.

\textsuperscript{45} There are a number of words which are associated with nocturnal emissions in the medical literature (and elsewhere). See \textit{LSJ} for the following words (all of which recall the words Julian uses [ἀνείρων νυκτερινὸν ἰνδαλματῖ]): ἐξονειρισμὸς; ἐξονειρομός; お話ρογμός; ὔλαιροξὶς \textit{II}; ἐξονειροξίς. See too the remarks of D. Brakke, “The Problematization of Nocturnal Emissions in Early Christian Syria, Egypt, and Gaul,” \textit{Journal of Early Christian Studies} 3 (1995) 423ff.; T. Vivian, “‘Everything Made by God is Good,’” \textit{Cistercian Studies Quarterly} 27 (1992) 1-12; J. Winkler, \textit{The Constraints of Desire: The Anthropology of Sex and Gender in Ancient Greece} (New York 1990) 92ff.; and J. Pigeaud, “La Rêve Érotique dans l’Antiquité Gréco-Romaine: l’Oneirogmos,” \textit{Littérature, Médecine,

\textsuperscript{46} The spelling change is clearly an effect of the translation of this word from Greek into Latin. Caelius Aurelianus entitles the section on wet dreams as follows: \textit{De Somno Venerio, Quem Graeci Onyrogmon Appellant} (“On the erotic dream, which the Greeks call the \textit{onyrogmos},” \textit{On Chronic Diseases} 5.7.80). See I. Drabkin (ed. and tr.), \textit{Caelius Aurelianus:
On Acute Diseases and On Chronic Diseases} (Chicago 1950) 958.

\textsuperscript{47} Drabkin [46] 958.
Therefore [if nocturnal emissions are occurring] it will suit, in the first place to turn the ailing man’s mental images away from preoccupation with sex, which [images] the Greeks call phantasmata.

Phantasmata are erotic dreams that lead to nocturnal emissions and they need controlling. There is mental work for the man to do. In addition to the mention of phantasmata here (note that phantasmata are that which Julian’s Pericles says he will be able to resist), Caelius twice mentions phantasiae (5.7.80, 81), which are often synonymous with phantasmata and a term which is often used of the wet dreams in other literature.

In contrast to this concern with a man’s mental state as a powerful contributing factor in wet dreams, the fourth-century medical writer, Oribasius, recommends a proper diet so that the soul will not have to endure the commission of a seminal emission. Didactically addressing the male reader, he observes that if you do what he says:

\[
\text{τοὺς ὑπνοὺς δ’ ἡδίνας ἄν εὐροῖς καὶ τὴν ψυχὴν οὐκ ἐκταρασσομένην ὑπὸ τῶν κατὰ τοὺς ὑπνοὺς φαντασίων.}
\]

(Collectiones Medicae 9.17.5)

You will find sleep more pleasant and your soul will not be harassed by wet dreams.

Oribasius enunciates here a position that emissions are primarily a physical phenomenon—it is a matter of eating properly—but it is better for the soul that the emissions not occur. Proper diet will prevent shameful episodes that have their basis in the body’s constitution.

We also find discussion of erotic dreams and seminal emissions in literature associated with Christian asceticism. As is the case with the doctors, vocabulary and concepts have commonality with what Julian’s Pericles has to say. A little background on the various views of nocturnal emissions is necessary to establish that emissions were an object of debate and that this debate had a degree of prominence.

Broadly addressing writings on wet dreams in Christian ascetic literature, Brakke remarks:

\[
\text{[O]n the immediate question [about the status of nocturnal emissions], Christians held nearly every conceivable position: some believed that such emissions were always defiling, others that they were never so, and still others that some emissions were defiling, and some not.}
\]

---

48 Drabkin [46] 961 (adapted).
49 LSJ: φαντάσμα II.
50 Brakke [45] 420f.
Initially among Christians, there was reluctance to declare a nocturnal emission defiling, as this was the Old Testament Jewish view of the matter: the early Christians took pains to take positions on questions that were distinct from those that Jews held. This reluctance gave way in time as the Christians became more secure. One thing that kept this reluctance from breaking down entirely in ascetic circles was the worry that a monk, over-fastidious, would stay away from church services, or synaxes, and so deprived of the Eucharist be rendered easier prey for the Devil. Such was the opinion of the powerful fourth-century bishop Athanasius in his Letter to Amun. The position that became dominant, however (and which constituted a rejection of Athanasius’ position), was one that was ambivalent about nocturnal emissions. Nocturnal emissions could sometimes be merely a physical shedding of excess that was morally indifferent but other times, when they occurred in the company of sexual imagery, they were the object of moralizing regard. In the late fourth-century Constitutiones Apostolorum, for example, we discover a distinction between emissions that are χορόρροια (“sheddings”) and wet dreams which are known as νευρόξεις (6.27) the latter of which certainly recalls the words that Pericles/Julian uses when he refers to “nocturnal dreams.” It was important that a man decide which of the two had occurred. This position that any nocturnal emission would need further consideration also appears in the anonymous Historia Monachorum (circa 400 CE). In the relevant section, the Abba Dioscurus commands that any monk who has had a nocturnal emission while dreaming of a woman (ἐν γυναικώς φαντασία, 20.3-4) may not come to synaxis but the monk whose release of semen was without dreams and involuntary (νευρόξεις . . . αὐτομάτως, 20.6) could. The will was implicated in the case of the former and not in the case of the latter. Dioscurus remarks that, αἱ δὲ φαντασίαι ἐκ προαιρέσεως ἔρχονται καὶ τῆς κακῆς γνώμης ἐστὶ τεκμήριον (“phantasias come from the will and are proof of a sinful frame of mind,” Historia Monachorum 20.9-10).

My assertion here is that a plausible reception of Pericles’ remarks when he speaks about “images of nocturnal dreams . . . empty and vain visions” would have featured thoughts similar to those we find in these authoritative discourses: dream analysis, medicine, and asceticism. Furthermore, Pericles’ position is similar to those who see a (possibly shameful) weakness in the body (e.g., Artemidorus, Aristotle, Oribasius, Athanasius) but it also has some commonalities with those who counsel that sexual thoughts should be a concern (e.g., Caelius Aurelianus, the Constitutiones Apostolorum, Dioscurus in the

---

51 See, e.g., Le. 15.16f. and De. 23.11f.; see also Brakke [45] 421f., 424-30.
52 See discussions by Vivian [45] 75-108; Brakke [45] 442-44.
Historia Monachorum)—sublimation is a goal he pursues, after all. Pericles’ flat-out negativity about the body sets him apart from some of the Christian notions I have referred to here but the worry with the mind and its passions and thoughts certainly recalls the concerns we see in the Christianized ascetic literature with its injunctions to self-examination. We may like to say that Pericles has arrived at the desirable place adumbrated by Dioscurus in the Historia Monachorum: Pericles’ mind, organized properly, will pay the emissions no mind because there is no issue.

Following directly on these words he has given to Pericles, Julian resumes speaking in his own voice. This resumption of Julian speaking in sua persona is a powerful move that creates the impression that this is a moment of true confession, whatever the truth (forever inaccessible to us) may be. As we will shortly see, Julian showcases his inability to do what Pericles does and so, on the basis of both the emergence of something seeming to be more real and the confession of inability, the reader can associate this moment in the speech with the prior destruction of mimesis by the too-great stage-machinery in a theater. In both cases Julian has abandoned a representational dynamic for a confession of inability:

'Ἀλλ᾽ ὁ μὲν Περικλῆς, ἀτε δὴ μεγαλόφρον ἄνήρ καὶ τραφεὶς ἐλεύθερος ἐν ἐλεύθερᾳ τῇ πόλει, ὑπηλοτέρος ἐμνυχαγώγει λόγοις αὐτὸν ἐγώ δὲ, γεγονός ἐκ τούτων ὦτὶ νῦν βροτοὶ εἰσίν', ἀνθρωποκοστέρους ἐμαυτόν θέλω καὶ παράγω λόγους καὶ τὸ λίαν πικρὸν ἀφαιρὼ τῆς λύπης, πρὸς ἐκαστὸν τῶν ἦν μοι προσπιπτόντων ἀπὸ τοῦ πράγματος δύναχερον τε καὶ ἀτόπων φαντασμάτων ἐφαρμόζειν τινὰ παραμυθίαν πειρώμενος, ἀσπερ ἐποδὴν θηρίου δήμητρὶ δάκνοντος αὐτὴν ἐσῳ τὴν καρδίαν ἡμῶν καὶ τὰς φρένας.

(Julian. Or. 4.6.248C-D)

But Pericles, inasmuch as he was great-hearted and raised free in a free city, ministered to his own soul with loftier words. I, on the other hand, born from the kind of “mortals such as live now” [Iliad 5.304], must beguile and encourage myself with arguments more human; and thus I take away the excessive bitterness of my pain, trying as I do to fashion some consolation—like a charm against some wild beast that is gnawing into both my very heart and viscera—[some consolation] for each of the hard-to-handle and strange visions (φαντασμάτων) always assailing me in the present situation.54

Julian says that the strategies Pericles employed are not ones that will work for him. He does not have his glorious predecessor’s ability to transcend the physical, a point that he underscores by reference to the Iliad. In a battle scene in book five, Diomedes hefts a rock that men of the current day would never be able to lift: ὁ δὲ χερμάδιον λαβὲ χειρὶ / Τυδείδης μέγα ἔργον ὦ οὐ δύο γ’ Tydeus’ son took in his hand a boulder—a great deed which not even two men, such as men are now, could do. But he hurled it easily, such was he,” 5.302-04). This reference looks forward to Julian’s statement later in the passage of his aporia in the face of the physical where he admits that he battles on even as φαντάσματα continue to plague him—φαντάσματα starring Salutius and capable of producing nocturnal emissions?

And so Julian draws a picture of his regard for Salutius that we may rightly call desire of one adult male for another. There is in the first case the arguable presentation of wet dreams as caused by the longing for his friend. But there is more, as has been seen. Julian primes the reader to read in this way by the earlier intertextuality with Theocritus and Plato. While it is true that these intertextualities can be understood as being of a piece with other late-ancient figurations of male/male friendship, the difference here is Julian’s embrace of the real: “stage-machinery destroys mimesis” and “I cannot measure up to the men of the past and these dreams assault me.” On my reading, Julian rejects the deployment of male/male desire as merely metaphorical. The question at this point is why Julian would want to assert what may impress some readers as unlikely and still other readers as outrageous.

Conclusion

I believe that whatever the truth of the nature of the relationship between Julian and Salutius (and beyond what I say here, there is nothing that I think we can say for certain), what we can say is that we have an excessive moment, a moment of rhetorical hyperbole that identifies Salutius as special. As indicated above, this conclusion may strike some readers as unwarranted. How can an emperor confess to or leave the impression of something that conceivably could engender a cat-call of cinaede/κίναδε? In the first place, I go where the evidence takes me and the call we may hear may be for some readers to examine what they think they know for certain about the ancient world. But such a response on my part is not sufficient (and perhaps more polemical than persuasive). And to that end, I will offer further thoughts as to why Julian may have liked to cut things so close to the bone, as it were.

In evaluating a claim such as this, a reader should, in the first place, remember that Julian is merely upping the stakes already present in other late ancient contexts—contexts in which erotic tropes define friendships and connections between men. Furthermore, in contemplating the spectacle of homoerotic behavior in high places being employed as a way to designate the strength of a public alliance, a reader may find a historical comparison persuasive. Bray discusses the ways in which George Villiers (later Duke of Buckingham) and James I of England figured their political alliance in terms that suggest not-so-covert homosexuality. In a letter from 1623, which reacts to James’ making Villiers the Duke of Buckingham (and he was the first commoner so honored in over 100 years\textsuperscript{55}), Villiers compares the king’s beneficence to a hand that will bring him off:

There is this difference betwixt that noble hand and hart, one may surfitt by the one, but not by the other, and soner by yours then his one, therefore give me leave to stope with mine, that hand which hath bine but tow redie to execute the motions and affections of that kind obligeing hart to me.\textsuperscript{56}

This letter is not a peculiarity in the context of their relations. Writing one last letter just before the end of his life to the Duke in 1624, James says that he wants to make a “new marriage” with the Duke and he calls himself the Duke’s “husband.”\textsuperscript{57} Letters such as these were not private documents—they would have been shown to others and they would have shown the world the power of bonds between certain men and, in this case, the esteem in which James held Buckingham.\textsuperscript{58} It is in this way that I suggest that we view the instances of same-sex desire and Julian’s varied confessions of it in \textit{Oration 4}, for it is surely certain that this oration did not merely disappear into a drawer. As is well established—a fact to which the numerous \textit{progymnasmata} and rhetorical treatises attest\textsuperscript{59}—there were numerous opportunities for oral performance of a heavily figured speech in the later empire. Furthermore, not only performance was possible, there was a diffusion of written versions of orations. In the case of the two praise-orations Julian wrote to Constantius II and the one to the empress Eusebia, oral performance is posited and it is generally agreed that the orations were sent over the Alps to the court in Milan.\textsuperscript{60} Similarly, the Justinianic historian Malalas reports that the text of the \textit{Misopogon} was posted on the \textsuperscript{55} See A. Bray, \textit{The Friend} (Chicago 2003) 171f. for more discussion of the circumstances surrounding this letter.

\textsuperscript{56} Bray [55] 166.

\textsuperscript{57} Bray [55] 96.

\textsuperscript{58} Bray [55] 100f.

Tetrapsylon of the Elephants in Antioch for all to read (Chron. 328.3-461). While we have no evidence of which I am aware for oral performance of Oration 4 or for a subsequent circulation of the written version, it is reasonable to suppose a similar dynamic of performance and diffusion. Thinking further about diffusion, it is intriguing to think of the oration as functioning in a fashion similar to that of a letter from a Caesar or emperor.

Julian mentions in a letter to a certain Philip, about whom little is known, that recipients of letters from members of the imperial family have been known to abuse them:

Και ἵσως ἔχει μὲν τι πρὸς τὸ γαυριάν καὶ ἀλαζονεύεσθαι τοῖς ἰδιώταις ἢ τῶν βασιλεῖα· ἐπίστολαν ἐπιδείξεις, ὅταν πρὸς τοὺς ἀσυνήθεις ὀσπέρ δακτύλιοι τινες ὑπὸ τῶν ἀπειροκάλλων φερόμενοι κομίζονται.

(Επ. 40/30; Bidez and Wright62)

Then, too, letters from the emperor to private persons might well lead to their display for bragging and making false pretences when they come into the hands of persons with no sense of propriety, who carry them about like seal-rings and show them to the inexperienced.63

While Julian reprehends the behavior of those with no sense of propriety in this letter, the letter also attests to a practice of displaying such letters from a Caesar or an emperor in the interests of raising the status of the recipient.64 Addressing his friend in ways that do not lack for epistolary aspects, this oration, I suggest, would have been quite a calling-card for Salutius.

As history shows, Salutius was most active later in the reign of Julian in various ways, including presiding at the trials at Chalcedon, when Julian settled some scores in the process of establishing his rule, and holding the office of Praetorian Prefect of the East.65 Interestingly, too, when Julian was killed on the ill-fated campaign against Persia, the troops initially favored Salutius to be the next emperor (Ammianus Marcellinus, Res Gestae 25.5.3). Rosen suggests that 62 Bidez [2 (1924)]; Wright [2].

---

64 Julian could also have in mind “rescripts” or letters certifying that an emperor favoured a petition at some point. J. Harries, Law and Empire in Late Antiquity (Cambridge 1999) passim but 20f. discusses the range of communications from emperors in legal situations.
he was seen by the troops to embody best the glamour of the Constantinian Dynasty.\textsuperscript{66} As he did not have the blood of Constantine in his veins, I suggest that we entertain the notion that his nearly becoming emperor was at least to some extent a function of his closeness to Julian. Salutius was, it would seem, the closest of Julian’s many male friends and the oration written before the imperial adventure truly commenced indicates as much. I am not asserting that they were homosexual lovers but what I am asserting is that Julian presents their friendship in terms of sexual desire and thereby suggests a special closeness and importance that was legible to others. Julian affects to be making revelations and his rhetoric plays with reality to make his point in the strongest terms possible. That he does this provides important information about desire among adult males and about the perceived connection of same-sex desire to male friendship in late antiquity.

\textsuperscript{66} Rosen [9] 382.